Disjunctive syllogism, a syllogism in which the major premiss is disjunctive, and the inference depends on the alternation of its terms; sometimes loosely extended to any syllogism containing a disjunctive premiss.

Ministers (1587) 39 This section beginneth with a disjunctive proposition is true. if either part be true. 2725 Warts Logic III. ii. § 5 A disjunctive syllogism is when the major proposition is true. if either part be true. 2725 Warts Logic III. ii. § 5 A disjunctive syllogism is when the major proposition is disjunctive: as, the earth moves in a circle or an ellipsis; but it does not move in a circle; therefore it moves in an ellipsis. 1847 Grove Creece II. iii. Ibid. 116 A Disjunctive Syllogism is a syllogism of which the major premiss is a disjunctive, and the minor a simple proposition, the latter affirming or denying one of the alternatives stated in the former. 1891 Wellton Logic III. i. 20, 210 margin, Logicians differ as to whether or not the disjunctive form necessitates the mutual exclusiveness of the alternative predicates... When the alternatives are not incompatible they are not exclusive. Exclusion is not, therefore, due to the disjunctive form of proposition.

an alternative or imply some kind of adversative relation between the clauses which they grammatically connect.

With the earlier grammarians the division of Conjunctions into Copulative and Disjunctive was made a main one. It is, however, of grammatical importance (see quot. 1824) only in the Coordinative Conjunctions, of which and is Copulative, while the Alternative or, nor, and the Adversative but, pet, are Disjunctive. Of the Subordinative Conjunctions, the Causal Lest, the Hypothetical unless, and the Concessive although, are also disjunctive in sense; but in their grammatical use these do not differ from the Copulative that, if, because, as, since.

1684 1 189 Now we come to the disjunctive conjunctions, a species of words which bear this contradictory name, because, while they disjoin the sense, they conjoin the sentences.

1776 CAMPBELL Philos. Rhet. II. III. v. § 1 Both the last mentioned orders [Adversative and Exceptive Conjunctions] are comprehended under the general name disjunctive. 1834 L. MURRAY Eng. Gram. (ed. 5) I. 229 The conjunction disjunctive has an effect contrary to that of the conjunction copulative; for as the verb, noun, or pronoun, is referred to the preceding terms taken separately, it must be in the singular number: as, 'Ignorance or negligence has caused this mistake'.

b. In French Grammar, sometimes applied to the indirect nominative (and objective) case of the personal pronouns (moi, toi, lui, enx) as distinguished from the direct nominative (ign. tu, il, ils), called in this nomenclature conjunctive.

A. sb.¹ (The original use.)

†1. The dies mali, evil, unlucky, or unpropitious days, of the mediæval calendar, called also dies Ægyptiaci, 'Egipcian daies' (see EGYPTIAN I b); hence, by extension, Evil days (generally), days of disaster, gloom, or depression, the days of old age. The dies mali were Jan. 1, 25; Feb. 4, 26; March 1, 28; April 10, 20; May 3, 25; June 10, 16; July 13, 22; Aug. 1, 20; Sept. 3, 21; Ott. 3, 22; Nov. 5, 28; Dec. 7, 22. They are said to have been called 'Egyptian days' because first discovered or computed by Egyptian astrologies; though some mediæval writers connected them with the plagues of ancient Egypt (cf. the Chaucer quot. 326), where the word appears to be treated as OP. dis mal, ten evils, or plagues, plaga; see Prof. Skeat's note, Chaucer I. 493); some, still more fancifully, associated them with the gloom of 'Egyptian' darkness. 1599 Shaks. Pass. Pilgr. 200 And drives away dark dismaldreaming night.

[Note. As to the identity of dismal with OF. (=AF.) dismal.—L dies mali, see Professor Skeat in Trans. Philol. Soc. 1888, p. 2. Already in 1617, Minsheu (whose own memory doubtless recalled the time when dismal was used only to qualify days) derived it from 'L dies malus, an euill and vnhappie time'. Early corroborative evidence comes from OF. and Icelandic sources. (1) The Anglo-French Art de Kalender of Rauf de Linham, 1256 (MSS. at Glasgow, Oxford, Cambridge; extracts printed by M. Paul Meyer in his official Rapport on Documents Manuscrits de l'ancienne littlerature de la France, Paris 1871, pp. 127–9), has a passage of sixty lines on the Dies mali, beginning 'Ore dirrai des jours denietz, Que vous dismal (Bodley M.S. dismol) appelletz' [Now shall I tell of the forbidden days, Which you call dismal], and further on 'Dismal les appelent plusours, Ceo est a dire les mals jours' [Dismal several call them, That is to say the evil days]. Here dismal is given as the equivalent of 'mals jours', evil days.

(2) A short Icelandic treatise in a Copenhagen MS. (Arna-Magnæan 350, written 1363, If. 148 a), begins 'Her greinir und dismala daga. Tueir ero beir dagar i huerium manadier at bokmali kallaz dies mali enn þat þydiz illir dagar' [Here tells of the dismal days. There are two days in every month that in the book-language (Latin) are called dies mali, and that is interpreted 'evil days']. The word dismal is not Norse, and must have been learned from England before 1363. In dismala daga, it is probably an adj. accus, pl., but may be a sb. gen. pl., 'days of the dismals'. Both AF, and the Icelandic treatises give a list of the dis mal or dies mali, identical with that given by various medizval writers, and computable by the memomic distich given by Du Cange s.v. Dies Æspytiaci: see sense 1 above.]

1. Essentially different or diverse in kind; dissimilar, unlike, distinct. In Logic, used of things or concepts having no obvious common ground or genus in which they are correlated. Hence distinguished from contrary, since contrary things are at least correlated in pairs, e.g. good and bad. Also distinguished from disjunct, since disjunct concepts may all be reduced to a common kind.

Cold, life and death; it is used by Boethius, De Syll. Hyp.

(ed. Bas.) 608, to denote things which are only different, without any conflict of contrariety (tantum diversa, nulla contrarietate pugnantia). It reappears in 14-15th c. with the school of Occam, e.g. in Rud. Strodus and Paulus Venetus, and is retained in modern transformations of the scholastic logic. Dispatch, despatch (dispætf), v. Also 6 dispach(e, dyspach(e, patch; 8-9 despatch. [Found early in 16th c.: ad. It. dispacciare 'to dispatch, to hasten, to speed, to rid away any worke' (Florio), or Sp. despachar to expedite, 'to dispatch, to rid out of the way' (Minsheu). The radical is the same as in It. impacciare to to impede, hinder, stop, prevent, Sp., Pg. empachar to impede, embarrass. Not related to F. depecher, which gave the Engl. depesshe, Depeade, common in 15-16th c., rare after 1600, and app. superseded by dispatch before 1650. The uniform English by dispatch before 1650. The uniform English spelling from the first introduction of the word to the early part of the 19th c. was with dis-; but in Johnson's Dictionary the word was somehowentered Johnson's Dictionary the word was somehow entered under des- (although Johnson himself always wrote dispatch, which is also the spelling of all the authors cited by him); though this has, since c1820, introduced diversity into current usage, dispatch is to be preferred, as at once historical, and in accordance with English analogy; for even if this word had begun in ME. with a form in desfrom OF. (which it did not), it would regularly have been spelt dic. by 1800: see DES-, DIS-, have been spelt dis- by 1500: see DES-, DIS-, have been spelt dis- by 1500: see DES-, DIS-, prefixes.

The notions of impede, expedite, are expressed by different roots in the northern and southern Romanic langs. The radical of F. emplecher, deplecher (Eng. Impeach, Depeach), OF. empecchier, despeechier, is taken to be a L. *pedicar (extended form of im., ex-pedire, or deriv. of pedica 'fetter, gin'); G. precher, Pracach, OF. prechier: —L. pradicare. This also occurs in Pr. empedegar. But Sp. empachar, despachar, Pr. empaitar, point to a L. type pacitare (L. forther, Pracaci, Pr. pa. pple. of pangére). The radical of It. im., dis-pacciare, Pr. empachar (with which perh. are to be taken dial. OF. empachar, ampauchier, dapauchier: see Godef.), have been referred to a cognate L. type -pactiare (cf., for the phonology, It. tracciare, doctare, exciare: —"tracciare, ductare, excitare, deciare, succiare: —"tracciare, ductare, exteriare, discidere, ampauchier, depender, and compactive, and capache, in Caxton depesshe, Sc. depesche. Dispatch, therefore, could not be of French origin. The date of our first quot. 1517, is early for a word from Italian, and still more so for a word from Spanish; but the active intercourse with the Papal Court and with Spain at that date may have facilitated the introduction of dispatch as a diplomatic word. Tunstall, our first authority for dispache, was Commissioner to Spain in 1516 and 1517.]

II. The action of administering, ordering, or managing; the system by which things are administered.

managing; the system by which things are administered.

This group of senses originates in the L use of dispensitio to render Gr. oicovosia in N. T. and patristic writers. The latter is used in r Cor. ix. 17, Eph. iii. 2, Col. i. 25 for the 'office of an administrator' (see sense 4 below); but in Eph. i. 10, iii. 2, for 'a method or system of administration (specifically that which involved the Incarnation). From this latter arose various theological uses: (1) Tertullian (Adv. Praxam ii. iii, iv.) uses dispensation-oicovosia to denote the Trinity as an administrative arrangement, i. e. a system of distribution and apportionment of functions designed by the Father for administrative purposes. This is known as an acconomical as distinguished from an essential Trinity: in the latter the personal distinctions are regarded as matters of nature and necessity, in the former of will. (See the distinction between Dispensative, Dispensatory, and essential.) (2) It was applied to the Incarnation (dispensatio assumpti corporis, d. suscepta carnit, or simply dispensatio) as the basis or organ of the redemptive system under which mankind now live (August. Serm. 26, 8 5). (2) The evangelical system is termed dispensatio gratin in opposition to the Law or system of works (August. Ep. 82 § 20), while the method of salvation by means of the Incarnation is dispensatio salvatic nostru (August. Serm. 237 § 1). Hence, in the Latin version of trenzus. Christ is called dispensator battering grating (iv. 20, 7). (4) Dispensatio was applied to the divine purpose or decree which established the system, and determined its mode of action (Tertull. Adv. Marc. vi. 18, Hilar. Pict. De Trin. ix. 66, xi. 13); also, by Hilary, to the Passion, as the supreme mystery of Redemption.]

II. from med.L. dispensare in eccles, use. [In later med.L. (by 1200 or earlier) dispensaire was used absol. or intrans. (= agere dispensatorie or dispensaive), in the sense 'to make an arrangement in the character of a steward (oirorofuon), administrator, or manager, to deal administratively, especially in reference to the practical application of a law or rule to a particular case; first, apparently, in the way of relaxing a punishment or penance, which according to strict law, had been already incurred, but in the particular case ought to be remitted for special reasons; thence, in the remission of a punishment not yet incurred, which amounted in fact to a licence to break the legal rule; and thus, in the general sense of granting relaxation, exemption, indulgence, etc. The chief constructions were dispensare in talk casu, circa just, circa aliquem or aliquid, and esp. cum aliquo (ut possil), etc. (to dispense in such a case, in reference to a certain law, or a certain person or matter, with a person that he may do something, etc.). These intrans. uses passed into English, esp. dispense with, which became a combined verbal phrase, with indirect passive, to be dispensed with, and has had a wide development of sense: see branch III. By elision of the preposition or other processes, the verb has also become trans. in the sense 'to grant dispensation to, for, or from.'

Transitive senses are found also in French from 15th c.]

o. I ne action of converting any substance or constituent of a substance into vapour by means of heat, and of again condensing this by refrigeration into the liquid form, by means of an alembic, retort and receiver, or a still and refrigeratory; the extraction of the spirit, essence, or essential oil of any substance by the evaporation and condensation of its liquid solution; and in a more generalized any substance by the evaporation and contensation of its liquid solution; and, in a more generalized sense, the operation of separating by means of fire, and in closed vessels, the volatile parts of any substance from the fixed parts, in order to the collection and in closed vessels, the volatile parts of any substance from the fixed parts, in order to the collection of the products.

As shown by the etymology, the original application is to substances of which the distillates are condensed drop by drop into the liquid form; whether for the purpose of extracting the more volatile part of a substance, or of concentrating or purifying a volatile substance such as water by freeing it from matter held in suspension or solution. When no more heat is applied than just suffices to cause the liquid to pass over in drops, the process is called cold distillation. Dry or destructive distillation, the decomposition of a substance by strong heat in a retort, and the collection of the volatile matters evolved, as in the destructive distillation of coal in gas-making. Fractional distillation, the separation of two or more volatile liquids having different boiling-points, so that they pass over at different temperatures and can be collected separately, the more volatile first, and the eless volatile in order afterwards. Distillation by descent (per descensum), in Old Cleum, the name given to a method in which the fire was applied above, and the distillate drawn off beneath (see Descent 1 d). In opposition to this, the ordinary method was called distillation by ascent (per ascensum).

distributere, distributio: The application of a term to each and all of the several individual instances included in its denotation or extension; the acceptation of a term in a general sense including every individual to which it is applicable.

Said of a term qualified explicitly or implicitly by such marks of universality (signa universality) as all, each, every, any, etc.; the one simple common term being treated as distributed 'over all its significates; e.g. in every man, the term man is spread out over, or dispersed among, this, that, and every other individual man.

This use of distributio (which turns on the question discussed in Plato, Parm. 130 seqq.), first appears in the Schoolmen of the 13th cent., as Shyreswod, and especially Petrus Hispanus (1226-1277), of whose Summuls the 7th chapter deals with the properties of terms, including Distribution, as an appendix to the exposition of the Organon, and with special reference to the solution of sophisms. The term apparently came into English logic through the medium of Aldrich: see Distribute v. 6.

1876 Pharmaceut. In U. 142 Under the name 'Dita' the natives of the Philippines indicate the bark of the Echites scholaris, Linn. (Alstonia scholaris, Brown.), a stately forest tree. Ibid. The fame of dita bark as a remedy is of old standing, since in 1678 it was mentioned by Rheede and afterwards in 1741 by Rumphius. 1879 WATTS Dict. Chem. VIII. 688 Dita bark usually consists of irregular curved fragments from 40 to 60 mm. long, 15 mm. wide and 1 mm. thick, covered externally with a thin leather-coloured cortical layer.

The ME. evidence favours this; but in modern use, both forms occur in nearly all parts of the country, with various differentiation of meaning. Generally, dick is a hollow channel or deep furrow, wet or dry, but in some parts (see sense 4) it is an embankment or raised fence; usually dike or dyke is a bank or wall, but in many parts it is a wide and deep channel for running water. The existence of dick or deck in this sense in Kent, Sussex, and other southern counties, is remarkable. The use of dike, dyke, for a sea-wall or embankment in the eastern counties, may possibly have been introduced from Holland: cf. the title Dikk-GRAVE.]

1. Legal dissolution of marriage by a court or other competent body, or according to forms recognized in the country, nation, or tribe.

Formerly and still often (e.g. historically or anthropologically) used in the widest sense; hence, including the formal putting away of, or separation from, a spouse by a heathen or barbarian; the pronouncing a marriage to have been invalid from the beginning owing to fraud, or to legal, canonical, or physical incapacity of the parties, as in the 'divorce' of Henry VIII from Catherine (now called in English Law decree of nullity), and the 'divorce a mensa et thero' (from bed and board), long the only 'divorce' recognized by English law, but now, since 1857, called 'judicial separation'. But, in strict legal use, now applied in English-speaking countries only to the dissolution by decree of court of what was in itself a legal marriage, upon grounds sanctioned by the law, and upon evidence accepted by the court.
